

Administrative law is a special kind of law. Its distinctive feature is that it applies to unbalanced social relationships: on one side a private individual, on the other the administration. Doctrinal writers are unanimous in their view that it is an autonomous right. Its means of action are said to derogate from ordinary law.