

The Erdos–Renyi model assumes that each pair of nodes in a network has an equal probability of being connected by an edge. This means that the degree distribution of the network follows a binomial distribution, which is highly unrealistic for most real-life networks. In real-life networks, the degree distribution often follows a power-law distribution, where a few nodes have a very high degree and most nodes have a low degree.