

Cameron Brink and Angel Reese express joy after WNBA announced chartered flight introduction. The WNBA has recently made headlines with the announcement that it will begin chartering flights for teams this season, a development that has been warmly received by players, including rookies Cameron Brink and Angel Reese. Previously, even high-profile teams such as the New York Liberty faced restrictions under the Collective Bargaining Agreement, which prevented them from chartering flights during the regular season. However, the growing demands and expectations from both players and fans alike have pushed the league to reconsider its stance on this issue. Increased pressure The pressure to upgrade travel accommodations increased as many top draft picks came from NCAA programs that regularly used chartered flights, highlighting a disparity in travel standards between college and professional levels. Earlier this week, Engelbert announced that the league is finalizing logistics to introduce chartered flights.
