

Recurrent episodes of acute shortness of breath, typically occurring at night or in the early morning hours, are the cardinal manifestation of bronchial asthma. Depending on the severity of bronchial asthma in the individual patient, there may be phases of partial or total freedom from symptoms, alternating with periods of variably severe illness.