

Human rights serve as the bedrock of dignity, freedom, and justice in societies worldwide. They are enshrined in international declarations, covenants, and legal systems, functioning as guarantees to protect individuals and communities from abuse, marginalization, and inequality. Among the most critical of these are the right to life, the right to education, and the right to equality—each indispensable to the flourishing of human potential and social harmony. --- The Right to Life: A Sacred Guarantee The right to life is universally acknowledged as the most fundamental human right. Without the assurance of life, all other rights become meaningless.
