

Interactionism: This theory proposes that language exists for the purpose of communication and can only be learned in the context of interaction with adults and older children