

The love song of J. Alfred Prufrock, is a painfully funny and tragic story of a man who is too overwhelmed with his own insecurities to function in a relationship. Eliot uses metaphors and imagery to show Prufrock's desires and allusions to illustrate his fears. Rather than taking direct action, he is always analysing the situation and convincing himself that any attempt would be futile