

The implications of Organizational Culture for Staffing Decisions Cultures vary across organizations • Individuals will consider this information if it is available to them in their job–search process Individuals who choose jobs with organizations that are consistent with their own values, beliefs, and attitudes are more likely to be productive, satisfied employees