

Shakespeare introduces the differences between King Lear's three daughters when Lear assigns the women a love scale in which they must trade their adoration for his bequeathed (given – granted) inheritance. The entrance of the king and his interactions with each daughter provides an illustration of the characteristics he finds most admirable and valuable, while the women reveal their desires, or lack thereof, for dominance and the steps they will take to acquire what they lust