

This zone, which may have zero thickness in swamplands and be several hundred feet thick in mountainous regions, contains three types of moisture: After a storm, gravity water is in transit through the larger soil pore spaces. In the zone of saturation, located below the zone of aeration, the soil pores are filled with water, and this is what we call groundwater