

Exercise-induced bronchoconstriction (EIB) is the most common chronic condition in elite athletes and, if left untreated, can compromise respiratory health and athletic performance. The results showed that endurance athletes, winter sports athletes, and aquatic athletes were generally more susceptible to EIB than athletes from other sports.