

After clarifying the media response in Qatar and Australia to COVID-19, the previous table shows the difference between them, as it showed the preference of the media response in the State of Qatar, as the media response was very quick and effective, unlike Australia, where the media response was slow and they did not take the pandemic seriously, The focus and aim of the media in Qatar and Australia were both on ensuring the spread of information to educate the public and inform them of the procedures and instructions, but Qatar excelled in this step in that it was familiar with all residents of Qatar, even those who do not speak the national language in Qatar, so that it took the necessary measures to ensure understanding of these matters. Unlike the media in Australia, the reports were variable and focused on several topics, such as initially on disseminating information about COVID-19 outside Australia, but in the middle pandemic crisis the focus was on the pandemic in Australia, and information, guidance and vaccines were disseminated about COVID-19, but the course of media reports quickly changed to covering political news and conflicts, blaming and criticizing government measures such as failure to quarantine in hotels and elderly care facilities and failure to communicate information. For Communities of Cultural and Linguistic Diversity (CaLD). In general, the media response in Qatar was better than the media response in Australia.
