

Vertical rotors Vertical rotors are fairly specialized--their most common use is during ultracentrifugation for isopycnic separations, specifically for the banding of DNA in cesium chloride. Once it is determined that a vertical rotor is appropriate for the end-user application, volume and speed become the deciding factors for which rotor to use.