

Once upon a time, there was a group of friends living in a small town. In the end, Lana learns that disrespect and rudeness only lead to loneliness and regret, while kindness and respect are the foundation of true and lasting friendships. He often made fun of people, belittled their achievements, and showed no consideration for their feelings. Despite his friends' attempts to advise him and change his behavior, Lana remained stubborn and refused to listen. One day, Lana found himself alone, realizing that his behavior had alienated all his friends.
