

Gestational diabetes, developing during pregnancy in women without prior diabetes, involves high blood sugar levels that usually resolve postpartum. Most commonly appearing in the second or third trimester, it poses risks to both mother and baby. However, early detection and management significantly reduce these complications.