

Powered by Google Translate
Translate in July 1789, an angry mob of starving peasants broke into a huge royal prison in the center of Paris, called the Bastille (see source a). The king, Louis XVI, had little choice but to give up some of his powers and the country was run by a national Assembly (a sort of parliament).