

The main problems with shallow foundation performance during earthquakes have been related to poor site performance and poor soil conditions especially liquefaction, cyclic softening, lateral spreading and other instability. The use of reinforced concrete mat foundations is one way to address this concern, as they can distribute the building loads more evenly and provide greater stability during an earthquake.