

Aesop's fables are short stories that teach us important lessons about life. The short story "The Fox and The Crow" teaches us a vital lesson of staying away from flatterers, which is very relevant today. Some ways in which the children can apply morals in their real life are: We should always ask the children to stay away from strangers. They can often meet strangers outside their school gate that offer them chocolates with their sweet talk. We should teach them to avoid such people at any cost and only talk to family members and friends. They should always be careful as to who they trust. It is always advised to trust someone only when we know them and understand that they don't have any hidden agendas for talking to us. We should never blindly trust anyone; if anyone is too sweet with their words, we should always think twice before talking to strangers or believing them. Short story with pictures takes kids to a whole new world of fantasy and imagination. It also helps in their brain development as pictures require them to concentrate, thus being a suitable learning medium. So, the next time you are having trouble making your kid fall asleep, grab a bedtime story book from the bookshelf and read out this story "The Fox and The Crow" to them.

crow fox fable

1 Story Summary Given below is a summary of "The Fox and The Crow" story: Once upon a time, in a jungle, lived a crow. One day he was searching for food when he suddenly saw a piece of cheese on the nearby table. The crow grabbed it in his beak and flew to a faraway tree as he did not want to share it with anyone else. A fox was passing by as he was sitting on a branch with the cheese in his beak. He saw the crow and thought of getting the cheese for himself. He immediately started flattering the crow. He started saying how beautiful the crow and his wings were. The fox also said that he had heard that crows are excellent singers, and if he sang for him, he would declare him to be the most beautiful voice in the entire jungle. Flattered by the fox's words, the crow opened his beak to sing and ended up dropping the cheese on the ground. The fox quickly picked up the cheese, laughed at the crow, and left. The crow sat there, realising how foolish he had been.
