

The findings suggest that social media use frequency and perceived importance of social interactions are associated with daytime sleepiness among adolescents. The findings may extend to other mental health outcomes and may guide future prevention and intervention programs designed to improve social media use, sleep, and mental health.