

Testing might show the student's ability to memorize facts and figures, instead of a true understanding of those facts and figures. However, an assessment done informally in the classroom might show that a student actually understands facts and figures, or a specific process.