

Caitlin Clark could play for a different country and not Team USA At The 2024 Paris Olympics. Indiana Fever guard Caitlin Clark received the disappointing news that she will not be part of Team USA when the women's basketball team heads to Paris for the Olympic Games. Whether she pursues this path or continues to aim for future opportunities with Team USA, Clark's journey remains a significant storyline in the world of women's basketball. The roster features Diana Taurasi (Mercury), A'ja Wilson (Aces), Breanna Stewart (Liberty), Alyssa Thomas (Sun), Jewell Loyd (Storm), Napheesa Collier (Lynx), Kelsey Plum (Aces), Jackie Young (Aces), Brittney Griner (Mercury), Kahleah Copper (Mercury), Sabrina Ionescu (Liberty), and Chelsea Gray (Aces). "Now, when Candace Parker and Nneka Ogumike were left off the Olympic teams, THAT was a snub. Nneka was league MVP, led Team USA in scoring a year before the Olympics, and was MVP of the FIBA qualifying tournament. CP had won two gold medals, was a former MVP and a champion. Think Nneka is the only WNBA MVP to not make an Olympic roster," Hill pointed out. While Clark's immediate focus is likely on her professional career with the Indiana Fever, the possibility of representing Italy in the Olympics presents a unique and exciting opportunity. Although Clark concluded her collegiate career as the NCAA Division I all-time leading scorer, she fell short of securing a championship title. Despite the setback, Clark has remained positive and supportive of Team USA. Clark's path to the Olympics with Team USA faced a significant hurdle when a scheduling conflict prevented her from attending the national training camp in Cleveland. Clark's exclusion has sparked mixed reactions across the sports community.