Some cases argue that allowing action before the date of performance would extend the scope of a contract beyond the parties' consideration. In Wall v. Wadman, the defense argued that the declaration of intent to breach should be treated as an offer to rescind, not a breach.