

The researchers also tested the properties needed to overcome their waterfall by flinging different sized balls through their water wall at different speeds. "Waterfalls can thus represent impenetrable physical barriers for small and slow animal fliers", the researchers wrote, speculating that some birds may be taking advantage of waterfalls to protect themselves from both predators (by hiding) and parasites that are unable to pass the water wall.