

While scientists usually think about urban regions as being large sources of ozone that effect crops downwind, wildfire smoke is an emerging concern. It can also damage plants by degrading the leaf surface, oxidizing plant tissue and slowing photosynthesis.