

Interactionism has been attacked for its subjective and relativistic nature. Furthermore, social structuralists criticise interactionism for ignoring the wider social context that interaction takes place in. From the Marxist perspective, interactionists fail to take into account structural factors, as the distribution of wealth and power, which constrain human behaviour.