

In my opinion, beauty is not only inner beauty, but also outer beauty. Your skin, hair, and body shape are all visual elements that contribute to (or detract from) your outer beauty. Some of us may be born more beautiful than others, with complete characteristics (if that is true, because beauty is relative), but what benefit does that beauty have if this person does not deal kindly and does not have good morals? These may seem superficial, but not only do they encourage people to make instant judgments about us, they are also important because your appearance helps determine how you feel.
