in vivo bioreactors have been developed to address the limitations of in vitro culture systems in replicating complex physiological processes.However, there are limitations, including limited suitable locations and difficulties in controlling variables and incorporating additional stimulation.These bioreactors are implanted in highly vascularized locations within the body to facilitate the development of vasculature in tissue-engineered constructs.Ongoing research is stilll ahead.

Summarized by © lakhasly.com