

Architecture can be effectively used as an instrument of social control, and by enhancing people's abilities to communicate and interact within their built environment, human efficiency and productivity can be measurably increased. They combine thinking from political sciences, psychology, anthropology, and sociology and inter-related fields to design spaces that enhance the flow of desired human interactions.