Water quality and the environment are closely intertwined but represent distinct aspects of our natural world.On the other hand, the environment encompasses a broader scope, encompassing the entire ecosystem and the interrelationships between living organisms, their habitats, and the physical surroundings.While water quality is an essential component of the environment, the environment encompasses a wider range of factors that influence the overall health and functioning of ecosystems.

Summarized by © lakhasly.com