

Infection control in hemodialysis units is critical due to the increased risk of infections associated with vascular access and frequent procedures. These findings stress the need for continuous education and strict adherence to infection control guidelines. Additionally, the study found that adherence to infection control protocols, such as proper hand hygiene and aseptic techniques, significantly reduced infection rates. Furthermore, surveillance and timely use of antibiotics were identified as essential practices for preventing infections.