

Biomedical engineering has a wide range of applications that have revolutionized healthcare. With the use of advanced materials and technology, prosthetics are more functional and realistic than ever before. Medical devices such as pacemakers, insulin pumps, and MRI machines are all products of biomedical engineering. This has the potential to eliminate the need for organ donors and significantly reduces the risk of rejection by the recipient's immune system.