

The development of squamous cell carcinomas involves a series of changes. There is a linear correlation between the intensity of cigarette smoke exposure and the appearance of these epithelial changes. It starts with basal cell hyperplasia and squamous metaplasia, which then leads to squamous dysplasia and carcinoma in situ. High exposure to cigarette smoke is directly related to the progression of these changes. Finally, invasive cancer develops.