

A hydrated salt is a solid ionic compound that contains water molecules within its crystalline lattice structure. When ionic compounds are prepared in water solution and then isolated as solids, the crystals often have molecules of water trapped in the structure. Frequently, the water is chemically bonded less tightly than other bonds within the compound.