

Despite lingering perceptions, 37.0°C (98.6°F) is rooted in a historical convention that modern data argue should not continue to be regarded as normal average body temperature. Sensitivity for the detection of illness may be inappropriately lowered if 38.0°C and 38.3°C continue to be the standards.