

Differences in haematology nursing practice are observed according to the nursing roles and some countries' behaviours. The nursing care activities reported in this article reflect the performance of traditional roles such as drug administration and education, with developments in the care of patients affected by haematological conditions, improved survivorship and ever-evolving therapeutic strategies, requiring adaptation of nursing care activities to support patients.