

In nuclear medicine imaging, radioactive materials are taken internally, for example intravenously or orally. This process is unlike diagnostic radiology, where external radiation is passed through the body in the form of an image. Then the external detectors (gamma cameras) capture images of the radiation emitted from the radioactive materials.