We speculated that the particle size of microplastics in the atmospheric laboratory may have been smaller and more harmful than those of the other three indoor sampling environments (Fig.We found that our research data results are highly similar to the previous research results of researchers who measured the diameters of petrochemical plastics in atmospheric environments [25–28].Colour has also used by other researchers as a method of classification [29].2).S2).

Summarized by © lakhasly.com