

The study involved 43 patients at the Temple University School of Dentistry's Maxillofacial Pain Control Clinic, all of whom had chronic pain resistant to multiple treatments. Each patient completed psychological tests, including the MMPI and Beck Depression Inventory, and had their pain perception and tolerance thresholds measured.