

When allowed by law, insurers generally use elaborate risk classification systems. Classification involves grouping together consumers with similar characteristics and charging them a premium or rate that differs from consumers with different characteristics. This section describes some of the common classification methods used by insurers. Subsequent chapters provide more detail on the classification methods used in specific lines of business.