

Experts. HIV, for which no vaccine is available, remains a major global public health problem that has already cost nearly 33 million people to date, and with an estimated 38 million people live with it. Although antiretroviral therapy significantly prolongs the life of patients making the disease a manageable chronic health condition, treatment is expensive and not available for all infected patients.