

Gaining fundamental movement skills (FMS) has been argued to be a contributor to the development of children's physical, cognitive and social abilities and is thought to establish the foundations for a lifestyle of physical activity.