

Researchers are interested in answering many types of questions. These types of questions can be addressed through statistical hypothesis testing, which is a decision-making process for evaluating claim about a population. In hypothesis testing, the researchers must define the population under study, state the particular hypothesis that will be investigated, give the significance level, select a sample from the population, collect the data, perform the calculations required for the statistical test, and reach a conclusion.