

In "English B," the speaker contemplates his singular experiences as a Black student in a largely white institution. He expresses the difficulties of establishing commonality with his peers and instructor, questioning the validity of his truth in comparison to theirs. Hughes employs the poem to investigate the notion that identity is complex, molded by individual experiences and cultural backgrounds. This self-reflection unveils the speaker's quest for authenticity in a context where his viewpoint is frequently overlooked