

In nonexperimental studies, it is often more difficult to label variables as independent or dependent. Not only does it precede student achievement but also it would be illogical to say that student achievement influenced teacher experience. In a study of the relationship between self-confidence and popularity in high school students, either variable could be considered independent or dependent. If you investigate the effect of motivation on achievement, then motivation is the independent variable