

As a Representative of Death: The poem narrates the story of an African American daughter asking her mother's permission to participate in the Freedom March in the streets of Birmingham. The readers can easily anticipate the ending of the poem. Her loving and fearful mother stops her from joining the march and sends her to church. She tries to find her daughter in the rubble after seeing her shoes.