

The shoulder and hip are great examples of how a single joint design can serve different mechanical purposes. This distinction influences clinical management: shoulder injuries typically emphasize the restoration of dynamic muscle balance, whereas hip pathology necessitates structural reconstruction or replacement (Moore et al., 2023; Berry & Lieberman, 2020). However, it is also prone to degenerative disease.