

Natural disasters, like earthquakes, floods, and hurricanes, cause widespread destruction. They strike unexpectedly, harming people, buildings, and the environment. Damage includes collapsed structures, blocked roads, injuries, and deaths, along with significant ecological harm.