

Parents and teenagers often have very different feelings about homework. Parents encourage their children to manage their time wisely, and teenagers try to organize their tasks to finish them without too much stress. They sometimes complain to their parents, saying that they have too much to do. Even though they understand that homework is meant to help, they can still feel stressed when it piles up. Despite these differences, both parents and teenagers usually try to find a balance. Over time, both groups learn that homework can be challenging but also useful, and they support each other in completing it.