

The case study analysis of child-centered play therapy (CCPT) for a child with autism highlights several key conclusions: Enhancement of Symbolic Play and Communication: The intervention facilitated the development of spontaneous symbolic play and improved communication skills. They observed significant progress in their child's play and communication abilities, which also enhanced their interactions and overall family dynamics. The child's engagement in symbolic play became more sophisticated, and there were notable improvements in both verbal and nonverbal communication.