

When scientists say the genetic code is “universal,” they mean that almost all living organisms use the same set of rules to translate DNA or RNA sequences into proteins. This means that the same codon (a sequence of three nucleotides) codes for the same amino acid in nearly all organisms, from bacteria to humans. This universality suggests that all life shares a common evolutionary origin.